01 Who You're Meeting

Raghu Malpani — Chief Product & Technology Officer, UiPath.

The company: $1.853B of ARR growing 11%, with the argument that enterprises scaling AI need something that executes reliably rather than something that reasons well. Dines frames UiPath as the execution layer enterprises trust for mission-critical processes in the agentic era.

What they sell: The UiPath Platform for Agentic Automation and Orchestration, combining deterministic robotic process automation with agentic AI and enterprise orchestration, plus built-in security and governance. Recent additions include pre-built agentic solutions by industry and the acquired WorkFusion agents for financial crime compliance.

02 Where The Company Sits

The distinction UiPath draws is worth taking seriously for infrastructure operations: deterministic automation does the same thing every time, agentic AI adapts, and mission-critical processes often need the former with the latter layered on selectively. Regulated or safety-relevant workflows at a PortCo are exactly where that matters — you do not want a probabilistic system executing a compliance step.

03 What To Pressure-Test

- ARR growth of 11% is the slowest of any software vendor tracked in this app, and it was flat at 11–12% across all four quarters
- Net new ARR of $31M in a single quarter is small against a $1.7B base
- RPA is the category most directly threatened by general-purpose agents — the repositioning is necessary, not opportunistic
- Competes with Microsoft, Salesforce, ServiceNow and SAP, all of which bundle automation into platforms customers already own

04 GIP Context

GIP: No publicly disclosed GIP relationship. Most relevant to the Corporate Functions Efficiency area of the reference model — back-office and shared-services process automation — and potentially to compliance-heavy workflows where deterministic execution is a requirement rather than a preference.

BlackRock: No publicly disclosed operating relationship; standard index holdings of PATH only.
